When the School of Design at the University of Leeds set about refurbishing its Clothworkers' South Building, it chose the Amtico Signature collection – the vibrant colours and laying patterns proved the ideal way to refresh the building's entrance and stairwell.

An impactful entrance

The flooring had not been updated in over 60 years, and as it was starting to crack and show its age, architects Farrell & Clark were brought in and tasked with a refurbishment. The brief was to revitalise circulation in the area, improve disabled access, and also signal to visitors that they were entering a vibrant space of creativity.

Statement colours

The versatility of the Signature Collection, with its vivid hues and distinctive abstract designs – such as smoky-effect Umbra Eclipse, and luxuriously dark Back to Black Vamp – was of immediate appeal. As the location was such a high-traffic area, the durability of the Amtico product was also a significant factor and made it a logical choice for the project.

Promoting wayfinding

It was felt that the original layout was confusing to people unfamiliar with the building trying to find their way around, so colour-coded floor levels were introduced over the four storeys. Each stair riser was given the tone of the approaching floor level, for example fuchsia-hued Marrakech rises to orange Sevilla – while the half landings blended the colours.

Laying Pattern

Bespoke Pleat

While the Pleat laying pattern is simple in essence, it enabled designers to get truly creative when it came to the landings in the stairwell. Four different colours were incorporated in a dynamic composition, as the tones segued from the previous level to the colour of the approaching one. The result is an exceptional example of the advanced cutting capabilities that enable a perfect fit and set Amtico's laying patterns apart.

Bold statements. Big ideas. What our clients say.

“The stairwell was dark and bland, and the client wanted to introduce visitors to the School of Design, by demonstrating its creativity as soon as they came through the entrance. The multiple colours and laying patterns of the Signature collection, as well as the fact that the wear layer is greater than in other products on the market, all led to Amtico being chosen.

“In the event, it was not only simple to install, it was also easy to minimise waste. We have used Amtico on major projects many times before, and will most definitely specify the Signature collection again.”
